New York Evening Post. Nowadays, we are a machine-made world, and increasingly so in every department of life. The houses we live in, our furniture, the clothes we wear, are turned out in batches, and often in batches of cheap ugliness. Even literature is manufactured for animal spirits. In the second place appro us, and books, too, are turned out batches that every one feels constrained to read at exactly the same time. It was Oscar Wilde who defined fashion as something so ugly that it has to be changed every six months. Circumstances warrant the sarcastic epigram, though it does not hit the bull's-eye. The truth is even less flattering. Those who talk of the tyranny of fashion are nearer the mark. For though it is true that the fashions are mostly ugly, and that they are often changed, it is not because we have the wit to see their defects nor the wisdom to grow weary of them, but because we are at the mercy of the leading manufacturers and dressmakers of the world. BEST SHOULID BE KEPT. There have been graceful fashions that remain enduringly graceful; and we shall find that the fashions that endure the test of years are those in which the lines follow, and neither exaggerate nor conceal the natural graceful lines of the human body, and that do not go contrary to the dictates of ordinary common sense. It has been suggested that a congress of artists should be appointed to arrange the fashions for the year. This would undoubtedly be an improvement on present methods, but though it might be a beneficent tyranny, it would be a tyranny still. And, if the artistic congress were to hit upon an artistic dress, there is no very good reason why the fashion should ever be changed. "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever." > Two lines of study might be suggested: 1) of ourselves as we leave the hands of nature; (2) of the appropriateness of our dress to the occasion. To this may be added a third, the study of nature for suggestions as to color combinations. It may be taken as an axiom that nature knows what she is about, and that if she sends us into the world with straight hair, for instance, it is probably because that harmonizes better with the cast of our features and the genwould curly hair. But we are constantly eeing instances where all that is charac teristic and of spiritual significance in a physiognomy has been obliterated, and all that is ordinary and even vulgar brought out and made prominent by artificial treatment. We first must appreciate that beauty shows itself in many types, and then vanis Railroad, and President Perkins, of I but effectively. Women value them.

to us our defects and prevent our dressing in a way to emphasize these, as, to give the usual broad example, a stout woman should not wear spots, nor a tall, thin woman longitudinal stripes. The same caution applies, of course, to color, and no sallow-complexioned woman of any judgment will be induced to attire herself in pink or green, no matter whether these happen to be the most fashionable tints. influence in line and curve, the value of color is, perhaps, more generally understood. The old adage of dressing up to the eyes and the hair is one worth bearing in mind. Much also depends on dressing up to the character. Some brilliant personalities can delight and exhilarate the eye by wearing striking and splendid colors, in which a more Quakerish temperament would simply appear to be floundering timidly and incongruously. And again, the more subdued coloring that would bring out the native dignity and sweetness of such a temperament would appear insipid and hampering to a girl of pronouncedly priateness has to be considered, and it is astonishing how frequently this is neglected. The general principle will no doubt be conceded at once. A trailing velvet dress that would look extremely handsome in a room in winter would appear, even on the same wearer, ludicrously incongruous if worn on the street in the height of summer. But where the incongruity is less glaring it is too often triumphant. Except in cases where a desire for display triumphs over the instinct for comfort and convenience a working dress is almost invariably picturesque. Passing workmen in review-the street navvy sweltering at ease in his convenient negligee, even the butchboy in his $40 hat, the artist in his blouse or velveteen coat-their costumes all delight the eye as well as satisfy the reason. It is significant, this close connection between the useful and the beautiful; but it needs to be more universally recognized.

FEMALE DEPRAVITY. What is the innate depravity in the female mind that makes a woman prefer to be "stylishly" rather than appropriately and becomingly dressed? One can but encourage individuals to study, not the current fashion plates, but the works of true artists, both ancient and modern, till their eye becomes so used to truth and beauty of line and color that it can no longer tolerate distortions and deformities and dis-A dressmaker who understands her business will know better than the average lay woman how certain artistic effects are to be obtained, and her help should certainly be sought when we are composing a new gown; but we must be able to impress upon her our own ideas. Artistic fashion journals, too, providing useful suggestions would shortly make their appearance to supply the demand when once it began to be uttered. A journal of this sort, supists, was once actually started in London, and was fascinating to peruse-but failed for lack of capital. Even this abortive attempt, however, may be reckoned, we trust, cars. as a straw that shows which way the wind is blowing. As for color, Nature's beautiful and subtle color-harmonies, who can ever hope to improve upon? Nothing is better for purposes of color-study than a collection of moths. Go to the moth, thou nartistic woman; consider her wings and be wise. For there are to be found an infinite variety of color-combinations, from the most sober to the richest designs, appropriate for both summer and winter gar- tire block. Then there are always the flowers, which suggest textures as well as tints. And there are rainbows and sunsets and dawns for those who dare to be radiant. Nowadays there are two classes of women who pay reverence to fashion; there are those who change their manner of dress in der to be different from the rank and file, as well as those who change it in order to be like others. The desire for distinction, though as yet may only be a matter an unworthy one, and there is hope that it will outgrow snobbishness, and, with good motives, spread throughout all classes When individuality dictates fashion then will be the time of the emancipation of women in its truest and deepest sense when they shall have overcome, not merely the artificial restrictions of outside laws. things, a woman's solace during a period but the weakness and follies of their own
